52 Walker is pleased to announce its fourth exhibition, MASK / CONCEAL / CARRY, featuring the work of Philadelphia-based artist Tiona Nekkia McClodden. McClodden will present new paintings, objects made of materials both organic and inorganic, and videos that together foreground her research into the limits of embodiment and exertion as well as her interest in gestures of concealment.

McClodden's expansive practice comprises film, installation, painting, and sculpture in addition to writing and curating. Encompassing the personal, the historical, and the mythic, her work considers the presence and absence of the black figure as well as the aesthetic strategies of illumination and opacity that subvert available modes of representation.

Installed under custom lighting, the works in MASK / CONCEAL / CARRY evince a variable blackness, realizing and dissolving figures and forms that are not immediately visible to the viewer. In her work McClodden has engaged with "masking" and its many meanings and guises, as well as "unmasking," in which, as an autistic adult, she attempts to unlearn an assimilationist tendency to suppress one's true self in order to appear neurotypical. This relates closely to "concealing," a purposeful act of obstruction that, along with "carrying," suggests associations with firearms regulation in the United States. "Carrying" also touches on deeper psychological aspects regarding trauma and burden that are threaded through the works.

MASK / CONCEAL / CARRY pivots around the concept of “training to failure,” which, in the context of repeated weight-training exercises, proposes the pushing of one’s body beyond its corporeal limits, to the point of temporary muscular breakdown, in order to build muscle. McClodden, who weight trains herself, transmits this idea into her work, communicating a core awareness of the body as it corresponds to the fragile boundaries of the psyche and the spectrum of pain and pleasure that is revealed in these recurrent efforts.

McClodden connects “training to failure” with “dry fire training,” the practice of shooting without ammunition to improve one’s aim. For the ten ballistic bullet trace paintings, the first the artist has produced, she devises a conceptual framework that extracts data from her own dry firing. Target drawings composed on gessoed Belgian linen hang on a shooting rail system and feature stenciled words, conveying the idea of language as an initiator of violence. Mass-manufactured shooting targets make their appearance in one of McClodden’s video works.

The Figures series comprises reliefs of objects such as pistols and the components of an AR15-style rifle, which are contoured in vacuum-pressed Kydex and genuine leather. Playing with the numerous definitions of “mask” and “conceal,” McClodden has created a luxurious chain-mail facial covering from gold and silver that juxtaposes the beautiful with the martial. The mask complements McClodden’s figures, as do new cast bronzes that are imagined or based on existing paraphernalia. Like the plundered Benin Bronzes, from which McClodden has taken inspiration, these spectral silhouettes suggest not only their forebears but also the figures who wield them and their narrative possibilities.

Tiona Nekkia McClodden (b. 1981; Blytheville, Arkansas) presently lives and works in Philadelphia. In 2018, McClodden was a resident of the Skowhegan School of Painting & Sculpture in Madison, Maine.

McClodden recently presented a new work, Achaba de Ogún (2022), at Art Basel Parcours 2022 with Mitchell-Innes & Nash. She is included in the group exhibition The Condition of Being Addressable at the Institute of Contemporary Art, Los Angeles, which opened in June 2022 and runs concurrently with her presentation at 52 Walker. Her 2017 work The Brad Johnson Tape, X - On Subjugation, which was recently acquired by The Museum of Modern Art, New York, will be featured in the museum's second-floor collection galleries opening in early August 2022.
