

Community Access Symbol

Excellent. Yeah. Okay. That sounds good. Can you organise that then? I can, I can. Jacob?

Okay. We will meet again tomorrow in the morning. Okay.

Catching up with friends after work is just one of the ordinary things that most of us take for granted. For the 1.2 million Australians who experience communication difficulties daily, this can be a challenge. That's why transport leaders like Yarra Trams are committed to communication access. Yarra Trams is the largest tram network in the world and the first to be awarded with a communication access symbol. This means that their staff have the skills and resources to communicate effectively with all their passengers. You can find these on the Yarra Trams website. Every passenger, no matter how they communicate, can be confident that staff will welcome them and give them excellent customer service. Businesses all over Victoria and beyond are committed to communicating with their customers. have become communication accessible and been awarded the nationally recognised communication access symbol developed by Scope. Yarra Trams plays its part in helping people, no matter how they communicate, to reach the people and places that matter most. This is how we tram.
