Making Sense of Facelift Options: What's Right for You?

If you've been researching facial rejuvenation, you've probably come across terms like facelift, mini facelift, SMAS and deep plane facelift. While they sound very different, the truth is that these labels often overlap, and their meaning can vary depending on the surgeon and technique used.

Rather than focusing on names, it's more helpful to understand what each approach generally addresses and why a personalized evaluation matters.

Traditional / Full Facelift

A traditional facelift is designed to address visible aging from the mid-face to the neck. Generally does not include the eyebrows or forehead.

Improves jowling, skin laxity, and deeper facial folds by repositioning underlying tissues and removing excess skin.

This approach is often best for patients with more advanced facial aging who want comprehensive, long-lasting results.

Mini Facelift

A mini facelift usually refers to a less extensive version of a facelift.

Focuses on early signs of aging, often targeting mild facial sagging, mild jowling, or laxity along the jawline. Using smaller incisions and less extensive repositioning.

While it can be effective for select patients, it may not address deeper structural aging and doesn't allow for excessive skin removal.

SMAS vs Deep Plane FAQs

What do SMAS and deep plane mean?

They describe in what layer/tissue plane a face is lifted.

What is SMAS?

SMAS is a supportive layer under the skin that helps maintain facial contour. As we age the SMAS weakens and contributes to visible signs of aging

What is a SMAS facelift?

A SMAS facelift, lifts the superficial SMAS layer to improve facial sagging. This approach is less extensive and most ideal for mild to moderate signs of aging.

What is a deep plane facelift?

A deep plane facelift is a more comprehensive approach that goes beneath the SMAS layer to release deeper structures and allow for more advancement of the sagging facial tissues. Ideal for moderate to advanced signs of aging.

Is one better than the other?

The best technique depends on your facial structure, aging pattern, and aesthetic goals. Generally a deeper plane facelift gives longer lasting results without looking pulled.

Facelifts

Do Not Change Skin Quality

- ✓ Facelifts reposition facial tissue, improve sagging and remove excess skin
- ✗ They do not change skin texture or fine lines

What actually helps wrinkles?

- Laser resurfacing
- CO2 Laser
- Microneedling with RF
- Microneedling
- Chemical peels
- Medical-grade skincare
- Neurotoxins (Botox / Dysport) for expression lines

The Takeaway

There is no single "best" facelift approach, only the best plan for your face. Surgical lifting improves facial contour while skin treatments improve skin quality. Together, they create the most balanced, refreshed result.
