

5 Reasons to Study Geography

It will make you a better communicator

You'll learn to understand abstract concepts and how to communicate them both orally and in writing. And you'll have to communicate with your peers to effectively complete projects and fieldwork.

It will help you identify moral and ethical issues

An important part of geography is looking at various solutions to problems and considering their impact on the landscape and on local populations (human and wildlife), and the moral and ethical implications.

It will make you a better problem solver

Geography will introduce you to a variety of creative solutions to problems, helping you to start thinking more creatively when coming up with solutions to problems yourself!

It will make you better at handling data

You'll handle a lot of data during your geography studies. Being able to process and analyse data efficiently, drawing evidence-based conclusions is an incredibly sought-after skill for many careers.

It will help you to understand the world around you!

Geography is all about understanding the world around you, from physical landscapes and processes to how and why human settlements developed and much, much more!
