

NewBeauty
NEWBEAUTY
10 Signs of a Good Eyelift
Allie Hogan | January 6, 2022

GETTY IMAGES / IMAGE USED FOR ILLUSTRATIVE PURPOSES ONLY

There's a lot to balance when performing an eyelift. Woodbury, NY oculoplastic surgeon David Schlessinger, MD says surgeons must consider brow position, the amount of excess skin, ptosis, drooping of the upper eyelid, excess fat and lower eyelid laxity when performing an eyelift, also known as a blepharoplasty. "A well-done eyelid lift is one in which the normal anatomy is restored," explains Dr. Schlesinger.

Boca Raton, FL oculoplastic surgeon Steven Fagien, MD notes that not only could a bad eyelift look aesthetically unappealing, it could also have more serious consequences to the health of the eyes and vision. With so much at stake, it's important to find an expert that has a track record of performing good eyelifts. These are the signs to look for.

1/10 Eyelids are in a natural rested position

Getty Images

According to Dr. Schlessinger, a well-done eyelid lift should leave your eyelid in a natural, resting position. “There shouldn’t be over-resection of skin which can lead to a tight unnatural look,” he explains. Over-resecting the skin can also lead to a condition known as lagophthalmos, “where the eyelid is so tight it can’t close properly and leads to dry eye.”

He adds that it could result in pain and even vision loss. Beverly Hills, CA facial plastic surgeon Kimberly J. Lee, MD warns that these kinds of complications could affect eyelid function and quality of life.

2/10 There is fat leftover

Tvi Nguyen / EyeEm/Getty Images

Since youthful eyelids are full and supple, a good eyelid lift preserves fat, says Dr. Schlessinger. “Removing too much fat can leave a hollow look. Although the eyelids may look cleaner, they can look older with the deep recess of the upper or lower eyelid,” he explains. According to Dr. Schlessinger, in some cases, fat can be transposed or grafted to avoid that excessive hollowness.

3/10 The eyebrows are positioned correctly

Getty Images

Your eyebrows are a hugely important part of your face, so it’s essential that your eyelift doesn’t alter the look of your natural brows. “In general, women’s eyebrows should be C-shaped with the tail slightly higher than the middle portion. Men’s eyebrows are more T-shaped with inner and outer portions at the same height,” says Dr. Schlessinger.

4/10 The two eyes are balanced

Getty Images / Image Used for Illustrative Purposes Only

Beverly Hills, CA oculoplastic Surgeon Christopher Zoumalan, MD points out that following an eyelift, you want the eyes to be balanced. He says it's common for eyelids to have asymmetry pre-procedure, but this should be addressed during the eyelift.

5/10 There are no signs of surgery

Rosdiana Ciaravolo / Contributor / Getty Images / Image Used for Illustrative Purposes Only

According to Dr. Fagien, a notable sign of a good eyelift is having no visible signs of surgery. Following the procedure, the patient should simply look “like a younger or better version of themselves.” A bad eyelift has “unacceptable signs of surgery” such as “significant visible scarring, alteration of the natural and youthful shape of the eyelid or surface contours that are asymmetric or unnatural,” says Dr. Fagien.

Dr. Schlessinger explains that a well-done eyelift “should look as if no surgery was done at all, except when you compare them to their before photographs.” Hiding as many incision scars as possible is essential to a good eyelift, says Dr. Zoumalan.

6/10 The skin on the eyelid looks healthy and youthful

Getty Images / Image Used for Illustrative Purposes Only

In a well-performed eyelift, the eyelid skin must be addressed, says Dr. Schlessinger. While excess skin can be surgically removed, this won't improve creepy or sun-damaged skin, he explained. He recommends a Co2 laser or chemical peels during the procedure to "help restore a youthful glow."

7/10 The lower eyelid has a smooth appearance

Victor Dyomin/ Getty Images

According to Dr. Lee, "Successful eyelid lift surgery results in a natural-appearing result that makes you look 10-15 years younger without the dull, tired look." The lower eyelid should have a smooth, youthful appearance, says Dr. Schlessinger.

8/10 The outer corner of the eyelid has natural placement

Photo Credits: puhhha/Shutterstock/Model Is Used for Illustrative Purposes Only

The placement of the outer corner of the eyelid is an important indicator of a good eyelift. “The outer corner of the eyelid should either be at the same level or higher than the middle corner,” says Dr. Schlessinger.

According to Dr. Zoumalan, good eyelifts impose minimal change to the shape of the eyelid post-surgery.

9/10 The lower eyelid isn’t retracted

Getty Images

“One of the worst complications of cosmetic lower blepharoplasty is retraction of the lower eyelid,” says Dr. Schlessinger. “If too much skin is removed or if the canthus isn’t properly tightened (canthoplasty), then the outer corner of the lower eyelid can turn down and expose too much of the eyeball.” This complication can lead to a change in appearance, dry eye and tearing.

10/10 The eyelid skin matches the surrounding skin

Getty Images

To ensure that your eyelift looks natural, it's essential that your eyelid skin blends in with the skin around it. "The skin should look tighter and smooth, yet match the surrounding skin so as not to stand out as different," says Dr. Schlessinger.

<https://www.newbeauty.com/signs-of-good-eyelift-surgery/1>