The accreditation, developed in partnership with SRC, and the recognition as the first in the world, "underscores our unwavering dedication to setting the highest standard for women's surgical health," said Elizabeth Austin, program director, Katz Women's Surgical Center Glen Cove Hospital.

Achieving the status of an accredited Center of Excellence signifies that Glen Cove Hospital's Katz Women's Surgical Center has met "rigorous, nationally- and internationally-recognized standards, Northwell Health stated. The accreditation process is a "testament to the facility's comprehensive and multidisciplinary approach to women's surgical health," making it the first facility in the world to receive this distinction.

"We are honored to be the first Center of Excellence in Women's Integrated Surgical Health," said Tanna, vice president of Katz Women's Surgical Center. "This accreditation sets a new benchmark for women's surgical health, establishing a global standard of care that prioritizes the whole woman. By focusing on individualized treatment and ensuring a seamless continuum of care, we are committed to enhancing the patient's experience at every step of their journey."

The path to achieving SRC accreditation involves an extensive assessment and inspection process to ensure compliance with its stringent standards. These requirements encompass surgical volumes, advanced facility equipment, clinical pathways, standardized operating procedures, patient education, and ongoing quality assessment. As part of the process, SRC inspectors also educate staff on best practices to enhance care and services.

"We're proud to recognize Glen Cove Hospital's Katz Women's Surgical Center for its leadership in advancing surgical care for women," said Gary M. Pratt, CEO of SRC. "This accreditation signifies that the Center is among the best in its specialty, committed to delivering outstanding patient outcomes and the highest level of care."
